Infection originates from two sources: endogenous and exogenous. The first originates usually from skin and nasopharynx of the patient, the second originates often from another person who may be either suffering from an infection or carrying a pathogenic micro-organism. Carriers are usually healthy and may harbour the organism in the throat. Human sources of infection include throat (diphtheria or meningococci), bowel (salmonella), blood (hepatitis B or HIV). Non human sources of infection include water (cholera), milk (tuberculosis), birds (psittacosis) or food (botulism)

Micro organisms may be transmitted by several routes. Endogenous infection may develop as a result of local spread, eg from bowel to peritoneum, or be spread via the blood stream. Exogenous infection may develop as a result of local spread, eg. From bowel to peritoneum, or be spread via blood stream. Exogenous infection may be acquired directly or indirectly by one of the routes like wounds, abrasions or penetrating skin.

- (i) What are the two sources of infection?
(ii) What is the pathogenic organism?
(iii) Where do the carriers of infection harbour the organism?
(iv) What are the routes through which microorganisms are transmitted?
(v) What are the various routes of exogenous infection?
